Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Stuff O Dreams, and Other Plays The scene is one of those curious combined living and sleeping rooms which are inhabited the world over by wandering young men of limited means. Michael Moran, tally fair, slender, with something wild, restless and brooding in his face, is sitting at a typewriter in the center of the room typing a manuscript. Through a window at his right he can look out into the street. Behind him is a dressing table on which stand hair brushes and the leather case used to pack them in, a safety razor in a black case, a photograph of a girl, five or six pipes, and books and papers which have been hurriedly thrown there because the typewriter table is overflowing with them. At Moran s right is the inevitable washstand, a round table covered with a white cloth and holding a jug of water and a bowl. A couple of towels are thrown over a rod attached to the table. A number of books are arranged carelessly in the window recess. A brown steamer trunk and a suitcase are on the floor, wedged in between the dressing table and the washstand. On the left of the room near the door is a combination bed-couch. A cap and overcoat are hanging from a rack on the wall at the left. There is a knock at the door.
