Not illustrated. 1885 Excerpt: .His relatives and friends all advised him to get this boy vaccinated, but his prejudice was so great as to cause him to hesitate in the acceptance of this advice, till, alas, the little fellow was carried away by the epidemic. This great trial was not, however, sufficient to remove from him his ignorance about the matter, even until the time of his death. Such was the firmly established predjudice against vaccination among the physicians of his class. If I remember correctly, the first man who dared to introduce vaccination into the City of Tokiyo was the prince of Sakura. He was a man of broad intellect, and impressed beyond all other princes with the superiority of European learning over our own. He sent some of his kerai to Nagasaki to study the new medicine, and early became convinced of the necessity of introducing vaccination to...
