Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1858 Excerpt: . . . CHAPTER VII. THE EXPERIMENT. . The morning rose bright and clear, only a filmy haze was just now gathering, that threateud to obscure its clearness, and gave to Natures surroundings a slight tinge of melancholy sadness, inclining pensive minds to a little serious reflection; just the beginning for one of those dreamy days when we feel like retrospecting the past. Nora had risen while the stars were yet visible; for she had always liked to observe the starlight going out gradually in the morning twilight, and the day stealing in apace. First, we see the dim outlines of distant objects; then they grow more distinct, marked on the blue, ethereal sky, until the broad glare of the god of day shows Nature in all her gorgeous coloring of beauty. Nora was leaning on the railing of the balcony, watching the receding stars, as they sank one by one and were lost to view, swallowed up by the brighter effulgence of light, thinking of the time when these same stars sang together, and listening to the gush of Natures music, so low and musically sweet. As she listened thus, she inwardly exclaimed: What a musician the wind is--how it tries to make music out of everything in nature; and what low, mournful music it can make, as it waves and bends the giant trees, making them sing all kinds of anthems, either grave or gay; how it sighs around the corners, and sweeps down the...
